As a board-certified nurse practitioner and national Galderma trainer, Samara Ambrosio is anything but your typical injector.

She's trained with some of the world's most renowned cosmetic injectors, and as an innovative thinker and problem-solver, she's studied structural design and civil engineering principles for the past few years in order to understand how the laws of physics apply to human tissue. Today, she's been named one of the Best Injectors in America, and for good reason: She focuses on results over profit, and her reputation attracts patients from all across the country.

"I won't treat any area in isolation," says Samara. "I consider the proportional relationships of the person's features, age, and ethnicity."

Customizing every service to each person's anatomy, Samara and her highly-trained team provide everything from Botox and IPL photo facial to body sculpting and collagen induction therapy. She's created and perfected her own widely-esteemed technique for correcting botched lips, and although the end result of her work often focuses on visible outcomes, Samara makes one thing crystal clear: Nothing about her work is superficial.

"Clients aren't just coming into my office for skin-deep changes," she says. "The root of aesthetics is emotional and social well-being. How you look is such an integral part of what you do in life, and being able to give someone their confidence back is very deep and meaningful."
